A computer security audit is a systematic, measurable technical assessment of how the organization's security policy is employed at a specific site. Computer security auditors work with the full knowledge of the organization, at times with considerable inside information, in order to understand the resources to be audited.

Security audits do not take place in a vacuum; they are part of the on-going process of defining and maintaining effective security policies. Computer security auditors perform their work through data gathering, observation, technology team interviews, vulnerability scans, examination of operating system settings, analyses of network shares, and historical data. They are concerned primarily with how security policies are implemented as the foundation of any effective organizational security strategy relative to risks and regulations.

Sure Presence brings together experts with the diverse skill sets needed to evaluate the security posture of your organization, application environment and infrastructure. Our experts will focus the business, the technology and the relationships necessary to complete the objectives of the project.
